At the heart of Every Body Looking lies Adunni, a young, beautiful woman grappling with the relentless scrutiny of her body and the expectations of society. From her childhood in Nigeria to her whirlwind romance in London, Adunni's life becomes entangled in a web of objectification and self-doubt.

Navigating a Complex Web of Relationships

The story unfolds through Adunni's relationships with various characters, each embodying a different perspective on identity and self-worth. There's her overbearing mother, who pressures her to conform to traditional Nigerian values; her enigmatic lover, who vacillates between objectifying and empowering her; and her supportive friend, who offers a beacon of acceptance amid the turbulence.

Unmasking Female Objectification

Iloh's writing unflinchingly confronts the insidious ways in which women's bodies are objectified and commodified. Through Adunni's experiences, the novel exposes the dehumanizing consequences of such objectification, both in personal relationships and in the wider cultural landscape.

A Journey of Self-Discovery and Empowerment

Ultimately, Every Body Looking is a story about Adunni's arduous journey toward self-discovery and empowerment. As she navigates the complexities of her body, her relationships, and her own desires, Adunni learns to challenge the limiting beliefs imposed upon her and to embrace her true self.
